

About AGE to age

AGE to age: bringing the generations together was launched by the Northland Foundation in 2008 as part of a national initiative focused on the civic engagement and wellbeing of older adults. AGE to age provides a path for youth, older adults, and the ages-in-between to interact, form friendships and maintain social connectedness, and improve their communities.

Each AGE to age site forms an action plan and devises local projects and programming based on the needs and interests within its community, with guidance and support from the Northland Foundation and its funding partners. Project themes include culture and traditions, health and wellness, volunteer service, history and ancestry research, tech learning, and many others. Representatives from all the AGE to age sites meet regularly as a learning community, as well as participate in an annual Regional Summit.

The success of AGE to age has exceeded every expectation. To date, it has spurred 13,100 hours of volunteer service each year among people of all ages.

Projects Evolved from AGE to age

AGE to age has created infrastructure in the region's rural communities and Tribal Nations that did not exist before. Thanks to strengthened community connections and volunteers who are engaged and eager to get involved, new projects can "hit the ground running". Projects that have emerged include:

- AGE to age Reading Pals: Reading Pals has been implemented in the AGE to age sites of Proctor, McGregor, Moose Lake, Two Harbors, and Aitkin to help early childhood and elementary students strengthen their literacy and reading skills with the support of older adult volunteers. Reading Pals volunteers donate more than 2,300 hours annually to read with children. Teachers report the program has helped their students become more confident readers, increased their comprehension, and made them feel special and valued. The program has also enhanced older adult volunteers' sense of purpose and physical and mental wellbeing.
- AGE to age College Intern Program: First piloted in 2012, the AGE to age College Intern Program hires undergraduate students to engage in paid, community-based work experience in AGE to age sites. The students grow their leadership skills, gain knowledge of intergenerational community-building, and bring fresh ideas to participating sites. Each summer, 15 to 20 interns provide over 3,000 hours of service and undertake projects, such as community gardens, youth programming, culture and tradition activities, and community events.
